I think it would reinforce a lot of students learning if instead of 2 finals the course had a test every two weeks. This would reinforce learning and allow you to do poorly on one of the tests and not have it affect your grade greatly and it would be a good way to continue to study throughout the year. This way too I think students would think harder and work more effectively on problem sets rather than just finishing them so they can do a rewrite.

The workload for myself personally was a lot and was difficult to handle but at the end of the day the course was interesting and extremely well taught. I loved the organization system with the homework and while I definitely struggled I learned a lot, I only wish the pace was slower so I could have digested and retained more of the material but as I said before I found this class very challenging while many of my peers seemed to be able to keep up with it quite well.

   Three problem sets per week definitely felt a little excessive at the beginning of the course, but after a few weeks I adjusted to this and the workload just enhanced how well I learned the material of the course. I typically prefer more applied math courses, and did not expect to overly enjoy this course because it is more abstract, but Professor Taylor made the material interesting and understandable, which has made me more confident in my choice of mathematics as my major.

In preparation for the tests we were instructed "Don't memorize proofs". The first test I followed this and got a score I was unhappy with. The second test I ignored the advice, memorized proofs, and performed much better. My point of this being that we are told not to memorize proofs but the setup of the exams encourages exactly that. I 100% agree that memorizing proofs is a poor way to learn mathematics, but if that is what it takes to get a better grade most of my classmates and I will memorize the proofs. I don't claim to know the best solution to this problem but some possible options include 1. Leo-esque tests (new difficult material with a big scale) 2. Take home tests (still with new material). Both of these have their drawbacks as well, but in my opinion either would be a better assessment of actual topics and less about proof memorization. There are most likely other options available however these are the only ones that I can think of.

I learned things about new topics, but already knew how to write proofs coming into this class (from MA161 and MA162), and since learning how to properly write proofs is the main focus, I felt that the class wasn't doing that for me. However I do think the class was set up well for people who haven't had experience writing proofs yet.

I took the course because I had to to fulfill a requirement, but didn’t get much out of it because I already took MA161 and MA162. I tried to take MA275 in the fall, but even though that class was only 2 credits and was supposed to be taken along with four other classes, MA275 was too time consuming and was stressing me out too much for a 2 credit class. I think that the structure of MA275 was not appropriate for a 2 credit class that is meant to fill students who took MA161 and MA162 in on the material that others learn in MA274. I like the idea of MA275, as it recognizes that many students from MA161 and MA162 already know how to write proofs, but I think it could be implemented in a better way; it at least shouldn’t be more stressful and more work than a 4 credit class, or it should be 4 credits itself.
